fortune in deriving his existence from healthy, long-lived ancestors. His parents were both of temperate habits, living a fresh and healthy country life. The great destroyers of his are not labor and exertion, either physical or intellectual, but care, misery, crime and dissipation.

He spent his boyhood and youth, for the most part, in the country, running, climbing, indulging in out-of-door games, and thus growing. These habits deepl-oped his frame to perfection, and gave a with which women vulcanza a carish eady with a pun, and a sarcastic repartee, ra strong thought—a very David with the tongue and pen too.

As a youth, Wm. Rowitt delighted in the occupations of a farmer. When he became a literary man he svoided London, taking up his residence in the suburbs.

Of life in town, he says very sensibly.

It is very difficult, almost impossible it seems, to feed well a huge caravansary full of people. The men who keep the hotels have not mastered the subject, as they have no insecred the surject, they have in Europe. At Baden-Baden one is as well fed us at the best cafe in Paris. So at all the crowded places in Europe, but here it has become a serious question whether it is safe to take a family to one of these large hotels for the aummer, the food being an offset to the advantages obtained by change of climate. One is almost sure to lose appetite after four days at even the best hotel, and to come reluctantly to a table which appears to be groaning with every luxury.
